may be a miracle drug for many people with chronic pain, but it can come with a catch. Most pain patients using cannabis to manage their pain, learn about common cannabis side effects like intoxication, dizziness, headaches, and nausea. But what you don't know could be worse than the pain itself. If you have tried cannabis-based medicine, you've probably noticed that it can give you a physical high. Your heart rate might race, your muscles may feel stiff, and your mind may feel a bit cloudy. These effects can be highly unpleasant, but they can also be a normal and beneficial part of the experience. Of course, not everyone who tries cannabis will experience these effects, but they can occur even in patients with no previous experience with cannabis. When you take a substance that affects the mind, it's best to learn about its effects on your body. So, what can you expect when you're high? And what are the side effects of cannabis? I'm going to walk you through the different cannabis side effects, whether they're negative or positive. On the negative side, the most common side effects of cannabis use include: Depression Increased anxiety Hallucinations Headaches Loss of appetite Nausea Muscle spasms Dizziness Weakness In a recent study, one of the most common side effects of cannabis use was depression. It wasn't clear if cannabis caused the depression or if people who had previously had depression were more likely to use cannabis. But regardless, many people experience negative effects from the increased depression. Other negative effects include increased risk for an anxiety attack, increased risk for psychosis, and hallucinations. Of course, the positive effects of cannabis use are much more numerous.
